KORKY KANGAROO

IT was a beautiful summer's day. Overhead the sun was shining and from the nearby woods came the happy chirping of the birds. But all this was lost on Korky Kangaroo because Korky was sunk in the depths of despair. Here it was only two days before the annual school excursion and he still hadn't any money saved to buy a ticket.

"Of course, I could ask Ma for an advance on my next allowance," he mused, "except I've borrowed ahead so much already it'll take me months to catch up. Ma said she'd whale the daylights outta me if I asked for any more money."

As Korky shook his head disgustedly, who should appear just then but Herbie Hippo.

"What's the matter, pal?" inquired Herbie. "You look low enough to give even a worm an argument."

Korky's eyes lit up at sight of his friend. If ever a guy was a sucker for a sob story it was Herbie Hippo.

Putting his head on Herbie's shoulder, Korky poured out his tale of woe. His voice shook, tears trickled from his eyes and altogether it was a performance that would've moved even a stone to pity . . . only Herbie wasn't a stone and for once Korky's words failed to move him.

"I know how it is," he said when Korky had finished. "Y'see, I'm broke myself."

"There is a way you can raise the dough, though," Herbie continued. "You might try going to work."

"WORK?" gasped Korky, as if someone had poked him in the nose. "You mean like running errands and stuff? Brrrr, what a horrible thought."

"No, nothing like that," Herbie interrupted. "Listen to what I've got to say."

As Herbie's voice rumbled on, Korky's eyes got bigger and bigger. If what Herbie was saying was true, here was the opportunity of a lifetime to really make some dough—and actually without doing much work for it, too.

It seemed that a few miles outside town was a cave, supposed to be haunted by the ghost of an old muskrat who'd been killed by a landslide years before while prospecting for gold. None had actually ever seen the ghost and, personally, Herbie thought it was all a lot of foolishness. As long as there were enough animals silly enough to believe such things, though, why not spread the word that the ghost had really appeared. Then, when everyone was scared out of his wits by the news he, Korky, could announce that he'd get rid of the ghost . . . for a fee, of course. It was common knowledge, Herbie went on, that a ghost can be chased away by anyone having nerve enough to stand up to it, face to face, and showing it you're not frightened. Once that happens, the spell is broken and the ghost up and disappears, never to be heard from again.

"That's a swell idea," said Korky when Herbie had finished, "but if you think I'm gonna be close enough to look any ghost in the eye, you're crazy. Besides, how are you going to make sure the cave is haunted? Answer me that."

"Simple," answered Herbie. "With the help of a couple of bedsheets, I'LL be the ghost! If anyone from town is suspicious and shows up to see for themselves, they'll still be too scared to get close enough to know the difference."

It was easier than Herbie said and soon Korky was standing in front of the cave. A safe distance behind him was a group of animals from town, most of them bankers seeing that they got their money's worth.

"Come on out, Mister Ghost—I'm not scared of you," called Korky in his bravest voice.

A minute passed by and still the "ghost" didn't appear. Korky repeated the challenge. But more minutes passed by and still nothing happened. Out of the corner of his eye Korky could see that the other animals were tossing angry glances his way.

"What's keeping him?" thought Korky. "If he doesn't show up pretty soon they'll think I gypped 'em. Why, there's no telling what they might do to me!"

Just then from the cave came a horrible moan. Then out shuffled a white-garbed figure who advanced towards Korky.

"How dare you disturb me after all these years?" moaned the ghost. "Leave here immediately or I'll see that none of you ever leave here ALIVE! I must have peace . . . peace, d'you hear?"

Korky opened his mouth to say something but somehow the words wouldn't come. There was nothing about the ghost's voice to even vaguely remind him of Herbie. Besides, that wasn't what Herbie had planned to say, anyway. In the background, the crowd seemed to sense Korky's fears and, as the white-sheeted figure continued to advance and the little kangaroo continued to retreat before it, the group of animals broke and fled screaming down the road which led back to town.

Without another word, the ghost turned and shuffled off into the cave. As Korky crept after him, still not quite sure that Herbie hadn't played some joke on him, he stumbled over a body lying on the ground. As Korky bent closer to see who it was, the body gave a low groan and sat up. Who should it turn out to be but HERBIE HIPPO!

Just then from the shadows in back of them came a moan.

"WHOOOOO . . ." went the noise.

Korky almost jumped out of his skin, for standing behind him was an eerie figure all clothed in white.

"W-w-who are you?" gasped Korky. "Don't tell me this place is really haunted."

With a chuckle, the ghost pulled the sheet from its face and there stood an old, grey-bearded goat.

"I'm no ghost, sonny," said the goat, "though I sure fooled you and those others. I'm just an old hermit who likes to be alone. . . . Henry, the Hermit, they call me. I like living here, so when I discovered what your friend was up to, I saw I'd never have any more privacy."

"I just pretended to be the ghost," he concluded, "to scare those animals away. Go on now, you young whippersnappers—beat it or I'll go down to town and tell what you tried to do to raise some money."

With a couple of gulps, Korky and Herbie took off as fast as their legs could carry them.

"That's the last time I try to make dough the easy way," gasped Korky. "That guy almost scared me outta ten years growth."

"You said it," grunted Herbie. "Did you ever think what would've happened if that'd been a REAL ghost?"

We could let the story end there, we suppose, but the truth of the matter is that everything turned out all right, after all. When Korky's mother heard from the animals in town how brave Korky had been in even trying to outface the "ghost" she had a change of heart and advanced him the money for the excursion, anyway. Korky took the money, of course, but he still can't look at a bedsheet to this day without getting goosepimples all over.
